It's believed that all parents always love and take the best care of their children. Each family may have different ways of parenting basics based on their environment. So here are some tips and benefits knowledge to share.

Parents must know this!

Unintentionally raising children to be ungrateful.

"If you love your cow, tie it up. If you love your children, you've gotta spank them sometimes" - This Thai idiom is all-time valid despite changes in value and belief across time. Whilst school does not encourage the use of physical punishment, we would like to remind parents to not neglect the need to encourage their children to be obedient and that if we do not punish children when they do something wrong, we might be unintentionally hurting them.

Professor Vidhaya Nakhawatchara, M.D. brought a case study about two families. He also shared his experience on how to nourish children to new generation parents. This is to prevent similar cases to happen with any other families.

A story of the first family: Parents are well educated, have good careers, and are financially secure. They have 2 sons. Both of their sons have been nice to their parents. They can enter good schools even though they are not quite so academic. They socialize well and are good at sports. They later become disobedient. They neglect what their parents have taught and their behavior becomes aggressive. There was a time that the parents could not take it anymore so the father hit a son with his hands. The son injured his father by kicking and suddenly left the house. From what happens, the father admitted that he has never punished his sons. He, therefore, did not know what to do. He wishes that he would nourish his children without punishment. However, he started to punish his children once they grew up and started to be disobedient. Aiming to teach children by starting to punish them at this age does not do any good as they rejected the teaching and injured the father in return before leaving the house.

A story of the second family: The father is a high-level government officer and the mother is a medical doctor. Both have been working very hard. They have a 13-year-old son. The boy is disobedient. There was a case that the mother recently scolded her son. The boy was angry and hit his mother on the head with a stick. After hitting, he left the house. The parents did not have any idea how to handle the situation as they have never punished their son.

From the case study raised from the two families, Dr. Viddhaya Nakhawatchara points out that children can still grow healthily and live well in societies even though they are raised without having discipline awareness built at a young age within families. However, they can lack discipline and may not obey family and societal rules. Later, this problem can be extended further. They may not obey rules in schools, workplaces, or even break the law. These issues cause hardship to them when living their lives with others in society. The root cause of these issues is from parents who neither punish children whenever they do something wrong nor compliment whenever they do something right.

Most well-educated parents in this era believe in raising children without punishing as a means of granting them room to think and express freely. Professor Vidhaya Nakhawatchara disagrees with this idea as children need to be told when they have done something wrong and there should be consequences at a young age is a means to make them understand what punishment is. Whilst it might be difficult for younger children to understand parents' rationale for punishing them, it's important for parents to follow through with what they say. Threatening to do something and not doing it is counterproductive and children will never learn about what they done wrong and that if they are disobedient, that there are consequences. The doctor also additionally mentions that "Remember, if you do not punish them whenever they do something wrong, your children will be socially punished one day, and it could be worse than the punishment you wish to give to your children too". What matters is that the father and mother must work together (where possible). Do not wait until cases similar to the doctor's case study take place because everyone will regret it. Parents must teach discipline to children at a young age so as not to regret later that they "raise children in the wrong way" which would eventually become sin or a phrase spoken by regular people "raising children to be ungrateful".
